There is no source to view, because there is no page to view.

I meant where is the html file located. Since it doesn't come up in my browser, I want to open it with an editor to see its contents.

In Internet Options there should be the choice for the default page. One is Use Current, also Use Default (which is the Microsoft site) and lastly Use Blank.

Arvin,

Maybe I'm not following you. I am using IE 7. The default page when I open a new tab is Default: Tabs. It has content.

Re: Off Topic Post

I have notice, lately, Default: Blank in the title bars when I have clicked links for product info from a couple of websites. The pages wouldn't open, but I just thought it was in IE 7 issue. Do you know where I would find the html page for default: Blank on my computer?

About: Blank is the default internet page. If you view the source, the HTML should read:

<HTML></HTML>

If there is anything else on it your page has been replaced by something which is probably evil.

Shell,

After checking my internet options I discovered that About Blank was in the restricted sites. I removed it
