Well I still like your style, just not the lines. Your resume is easy to follow.

Few suggestions. The font size is fine, is also a font that's easy to read. That is very important. Also while I like the bullets, but I still think there is too much white space there. (to the left) I might also recommend your summary of qualifications be listed under your experience. Hiring managers will look at what you can do after they see who you've worked for. With this however you can also leak some of what you can do in your objective.

"At the present time, I am looking for opportunities developing software, databases, websites; and graphics for reputable companies. I intend to leverage my salary to finance an education."

Try to sell yourself without asking for a job. I would consider a rewrite here, Don't say what your looking for in that manor. Let the HR guy know who you are and brag a little, but don't say your looking. Let them come to you.

References:

Do not list any references on a resume. You may put references available upon request, but don't list them here. When you create your references document make certain it flows the same way your resume does. so the HR guy will know your references match your resume by glance only.

Your name:

Don't make your name and contact information too big, yes it needs to stand out, but not that much. also I recommend (especially if your resume is more than one page) you put your Name in small print at the bottom of each page in the footer.

"Self-Employed (this sucks, need a better one)"

What did you do? Your title is your own. were you an application consultant? etc.

Keyword Summary:

Is this only for the web? This section of the resume should not exist, as it distracts from the general feel and flow of your resume. (which again does flow well)

Additional Experience:

Are these places you did work for? As a consultant or project basis? If so maybe you could consider a using a "Portfolio" instead of this section. (I know it's just a name, but this way you can state a few things about what it was you did, instead of just plugging names here)

That's enough for now, but all in all, just remember a resume is an extension of ones career as well as their personality. Look positive a
