Exactly -- Profile and Membership are two related, but different features. Think of them as two different storage locations for different types of data. Both types of data are for the one person, but one set is for authentication and the other is for the extra profile data. So the model in v2.0 separates these two. If you don't want to do this, then don't use those features.

Thank Ballen,
But I didn't understand your opinions in the discussion you mentioned.
I just want to add some attributes to a users.
If ntegrate Profile with Membership is not a good idea, how can I do that?

This isn't exactly the model ASP.NET 2.0 is geared for. We discussed this topic recently here:
