

microsoft.public.frontpage.client: Re: Difficulty Publishing Large WEB site >> prevent the "server shut down connection" error?

>>
>>
>> "Teri Carnright" wrote:
>>
>>> As a P.S.~
>>>
>>> There are certainly settings to prevent the shutdown, BUT, what is available >>> to you depends on where you are being hosted. Your host will be juggling >>> total allowable bandwidth between you, other dedicated servers, and >>> non-dedicated hosting clients, so as not to run the bandwidth out the roof.
>>> Face it - lines can only handle "so much" - and just because your server is >>> dedicated does not mean your line is dedicated.
>>>
>>> My recommendation is to contact the host of the dedicated server and ask the >>> two questions:
>>>
>>> 1) (from my last post) - what type backup can he provide if you work
>>> "live", and
>>> 2) how can he accommodate you if you require 8-10 straight hours upload time
>>>
>>> Teri
>>> :)
>>>
>>>
>>> "P. McWhorter" wrote:
>>>
>>> > My frontpage WEB site is about 600 Meg, and about 2500 pages. On a fast DSL >>> > line it takes about 8 hours to publish. I am running frontpage 2003 on a new >>> > computer, and have a dedicated Windows 2003 server running only this WEB site.
>>> >
>>> > Of course, I only "publish changes", but every once in a while the local >>> > copy gets out of sync with the live site, and frontpage insists on publishing >>> > the entire site. The problem is that after about 15 minutes or so into the >>> > publish I get a "server unexpectedly closed the connection" error. If I am >>> > lucky, if I try and publish again, it starts where it left off. If I am not >>> > lucky, it goes all the way back to square one. In any event every 10-30 >>> > minutes I get the "Server closed connection" error. In the end, it can take >>> > several days (and nights) to finally get the entire site published.
>>> >
>>> > I have read the previous posts on this topic, and see the primary >>> > suggestions being to either go to a database (which I dont have the skill or >>> > resources to do), or go to subsites, which would not work well for this site.
>>> >
>>> > My question is whether there is any way to actually SOLVE the problem and >>> > allow publishing of large sites. Are there settings or configurations on the >>> > server that would prevent the server from closing the connection?
>>> >
>>> > Before getting the dedicated server, I experimented with 5 or 6 WEB hosting >>> > companies, and there was one that I could publish to, even if the publish >>> > took 20 hours without a "server shut connection" error. Of course they would >>> > not tell me the server configuration that allowed that to work, but I know >>> > that it is possible on a windows 2003 server.
>>> >
>>> > Any help on how to solve this problem would be appreciated.
>>> >
>>> >
>>> >
>>> > --
>>> > P. McWhorter
>>> >
>
>