I finally got some smarts and went to Dell support, found a Sound device for my PC , DL it and installed same. It now works. It proves there is a way to fix stuff if you are persistent.

I am glad to hear that your problem now is solved back at XP. My guess now is that some software was not reinstalled when you went to Vista. I also have a Dell that is a few years old. It came with many CDs of programs that you often have to reinstall if you do a clean install of the OS. Not all computers these days supply backup CDs, but use other methods. Some of the software comes from Microsoft, and much from Dell and others. So do not be surprised if something else will not work now that you are back at XP. If so, brush up on how to reinstall Dell and other programs and hope you saved all of the CDs if that is the way Dell provided for backup on your computer. My guess is that you had the same problem when you went from XP to Vista. I did not think of that then, because I was not aware you had just updated to Vista. If you go back to Vista, it is quite likely you will have to install some programs again. At least on my Dell computer, there was a backup CD or two for various drivers needed for many things to operate properly.
