you can try editing the style the signature uses.... but honestly, I think you are putting too much emphasis into making email look like a printed letter (with a letterhead).

I've seen many people have problems with Outlook's spell checking in their signatures.

Does any have solution for signature where there is logo at the top, middle text (i make it 'type here' for my clients) and bottom part with address, disclaimer etc. Spell check does not work then (its outlook 2003).

I obviously set 'always suggest replacements for misspelled words' and 'check before sending'. Also word is chosen to edit emails.

The only way now to make it check is to select text then tools – language – set language and untick 'do not check spelling or grammar'. I wished it was possible to set it once forever to be unticked but haven't found the way to do this. Even with it unticked it will only underline wrong spelled words – no suggestion on right click.

Re: Signature with logo – spell checking does not work

I managed to solve it for new emails when setting this signature file as stationery :D But my client wont accept it not working for replies.

I found the way to go over it with removing logo and 'type here' text but then its types in black (need to change it manually) and on the very left (my signature in html is centered table with padding for text). Client finds it unacceptable and does not believe its not possible.

Please tell me there is a way to make it 'spell checkable' by default without using any tricks or there is any way Microsoft will make it possible or I will loose client.

Some people in my client's company have outlook 2007 – I was unable to find a way to put own stationery over there, and so spell checking does not work even for new emails :/
