Thank you Daiviid for the prompt reply, it is appreciated.

I shall try the suggestions you have made and report back here as to the results (for the benefit of anyone else who may be experiencing the same challenges)

Best Wishes

Steve,

Some people have no problems with their Pub 2003 generated sites being viewed in FireFox and other browsers, and some don't.

Here are some things to do that might help. I would suggest that as you take these steps, then Publish to the Web, to a folder on your hard drive, perhaps your desktop, where you can find the files easily. Then open FireFox and browse to the *.*.htm files and open them to test.

First of all make sure you are using the Publish to the Web, instead of File > Save As a web page.

Go to Tools > Options > Web tab and untick "Rely on VML..." and "Allow PNG..." and test your output.

Then try switching the default Encoding from what ever it is to Unicode (UTF8), Western European (ISO), and Western European (Windows), and test your output each time.

Hopefully one of those steps will make a difference, and then you should plan on either reducing and optimizing your images with a third party image editing program before you insert them, and/or compressing the images. Your images are oversized and take a long time to load even in IE...

I have created some basic web pages in Publisher 2003 – just a plain background with a communal masthead and text only content – well OK there are some text box borders and some text formatting – but no pictures etc.

The problem is, the pages can only be viewed in Internet Explorer – if anyone tries to view them in firefox or opera they only see the text on the index page and not the masthead, nor the links to the other pages.

How can I make the pages viewable in other browsers please? Notably, Firefox and Opera

Thanks

Steve
