Not sure what's going on but what you've described initially sounds like you did the righth thing. The way I solved this was to create a new site group and provide these essential permissions (among others) at the portal level,

Add Items – Add items to lists, add documents to SharePoint document libraries, add Web Discussion comments

Edit Items – Edit items in lists, edit documents in SharePoint document libraries, and customize Web Part Pages in SharePoint document libraries

Delete items from a list, documents from a document library, and Web discussion comments in documents

Add a test user account to this new group and give it a whirl. I just did testing on this very same thing today and it works as I would expect. Users are able to add/edit/delete their own listings/doc/etc, but not other people's. I also have Area approval on so there is a small training issue in that when a user publishes a listing to an area, their listing doesn't show up after they've added it (unless they're in Edit mode for the page, vs View Page). Listings pending approval will be designated with a special icon.

HTH.
