I keep several different profiles on my computer so that everyone in the family has there own email and settings. Although I am always trying to get my kids to close all programs and log off, often I find that they walk away from the computer without logging out. I am thinking that this is using up my computer resources and I like to log them off myself.

When I had XP I was able to start the task manager, select users, and then log off any user. Now in Vista, it says that the user could not be logged off. I am the administrator of the computer and I should be able to do this, shouldn't I? My only alternative at this point is to re-start the computer. Is there a better way?
