I assume you mean you answered "No" with regard to the responses to your post being helpful. That will guide others who read the thread.

Let me see if I can dig in here a bit. First, if this is a relatively recent issue, try using System Restore to take your system back to a time prior to when this began. Start\All Programs\Accessories\System Tools\System Restore.

If that doesn't resolve it, make sure your antivirus software is up to date and run a virus scan on your system and check for any possible malware on your system, download, install and run Ad Aware:
www.lavasoftusa.com

Assuming your system is clean of any viruses or malware, SysFader would seem to be something to do with your Soundcard. First, open Control Panel, open System, go to the Hardware tab, click the Device Manager button and check for any red or yellow warnings next to any of the listed devices. If you see any, you should try to reinstall the drivers for the specified device and if that doesn't resolve it, go to the device manufacturer's website and check for the latest XP compatible drivers for that device.

If you see no red or yellow warnings, I'd try the above procedure with your soundcard. Try reinstalling its drivers and if that fails to resolve it, go to the soundcard manufacturer's website, make note of their installation instructions and download and install the latest XP drivers for your soundcard.

That said, sysfader may be related to the Musicmatch issue. You should be able to rectify the Musicmatch error by simply reinstalling Musicmatch.
