I was wondering if there was a difference in how user accounts are removed in Windows XP? When I use the account manager in the control panel the user's profile folder still appears in the Documents and Settings folder and the user profile changes to user unknown in the user profiles section of System Properties (under the advanced tab.)

When I remove a user profile using the user profile section in System properties (under the advanced tab) the user's profile is removed from the System properties section, the user's profile folder is removed from the Documents and Settings folder, but I still have to remove the user from the user manager in control panel.

What is the difference in these methods? Removing a user from the System Properties seems cleaner.
