I'm glad that 4.3.0.0 works for you. My many years of PC usage has taught me NOT to upgrade unless either I'm having a problem with the version I'm using, or a feature that I MUST have is available only in the upgrade. Newer isn't always better, and often upgrading can make a system that's running fine, have problems. That's my rule of thumb for ALL updates, be they program, OS, drivers, utilities, etc.. PC users have different systems and different needs. There will always be the users who will update just because it's THE NEWEST Update.

There are people who will swear that SP2 is the greatest thing since microwave popcorn. A year before Windows XP was released, I went to an interesting web site, where a tech person claimed that there were too many serious security holes in XP for it to be released to the masses, who wouldn't know how to cope with the problems it would bring. MS scoffed at those "doom sayers," released it anyway, and the fallout has been snowballing ever since. I was reading a USA Today Article which blamed Windows XP for tech support jobs being farmed out to third world countries. It seems that Dell and other PC makers make a small profit margin on their systems.

The security hole problems in Windows XP caused an astronomical increase in tech support resources, so tech support had to be farmed out to third world countries where people earn $20-$30 a month. And, the usual three year support is down to one year, with options to pay more to extend coverage. Regardless of the MS position on SP2, and taking to account that we only read of the problems here, THERE ARE STILL TOO MANY PROBLEMS WITH SP2. If someone doesn't want to risk trashing their system with SP2, an alternative is just installing a decent firewall, practicing Safe Computing on the internet, and keeping virus definitions up to date. There are many free pop-up blockers, and free BHO removal utilities too. Doing the above is an alternative to risking any problems with SP2. Even though my services are in constant demand for fixing problems caused by SP2, I think it's Microsoft's biggest mistake since Windows ME, and will garner more anti-Microsoft sentiment. BTW, security holes have already been found in SP2. Why bother? Because you've been told that you need it? Critical upgrade my a--.
