

microsoft.public.windowsxp.general: Re: what is an ASP.NET machine .. .net framework etc. ?

Re: what is an ASP.NET machine .. .net framework etc. ?

Source:

<http://www.tech-archive.net/Archive/WinXP/microsoft.public.windowsxp.general/2004-10/14536.html>

From: Don Burnette (d.burnette_at_clothes.comcast.net)

Date: 10/13/04

Date: Wed, 13 Oct 2004 10:34:40 -0500

Hi Richard,

It should be safe to just delete the user account – .net framework will still remain installed, however, as I mentioned, latest XP updates I believe hides it.

Also, you can download the Powertoys from Microsoft, which includes Tweak UI – you can hide it or show it from there as well I believe.

--

Don Burnette

RJK wrote:

> Hello Don

>

> Thank for your input, I am tempted to make a restore point, (if one > of those would "cover" the situation - seeing as they don't even back > up the system registry), and delete the account. I wouldn't have > objected to having the .net framework installed on my machine, if it > hadn't been for something creating this extra user account, (which > seems to be unnecessary?). Was it the .net framework that created > the account or the Norton Ghost 9.0 installation that created it ?
> :-) My objection arose when my XP Home edition boot-up / logon > changed and there seems to be no way of changing it back to how it > was without deleting this new user account, (single user / no logon > screen), without perhaps deleting the .ASP-whatever a/c. > regards, Richard

>

>

> "Don Burnette" <d.burnette@clothes.comcast.net> wrote in message > news:uWp3DZNsEHA.636@TK2MSFTNGP09.phx.gbl...

>> I would imagine you can delete the user account if it bugs you, but >> I would not uninstall the .net framework. As time goes on there will >> be more programs written with .net framework, as you have already >> seen with Ghost 9.0.

>> I use DriveImage 7, and it too uses the .net framework.

>>

>> ATI's recent release of video drivers, includes a new catalyst >> control center, which utilizes the .net framework as well.

>>

>> Also, if I am not mistaken, if you have all your XP updates, that
>> .net user account is hidden by default.

>>

>>

Re: what is an ASP.NET machine .. .net framework etc. ?

microsoft.public.windowsxp.general: Re: what is an ASP.NET machine .. .net framework etc. ?

```
>>
>>
>> --
>> Don Burnette
>>
>>
>>
>>
>> RJK wrote:
>>> Thanks Harry
>>>
>>> The account appeared after I installed Norton Ghost 9.0 - which >>> required the .net framework. Not knowing anything about the.net >>> framework and why Norton required it be installed in order to use the >>> Ghost program, I'm a bit reluctant to fiddle with it. Sort afraid >>> that I might upset Ghost.
>>> regards, Richard
>>>
>>>
>>> "Harry Ohrn" <harry---@webtree.ca> wrote in message >>> news:%23oaAm$IseEHA.2196@TK2MSFTNGP15.phx.gbl...
>>>> see here http://www.microsoft.com/net/basics/
>>>>
>>>> It's an account created by installing the .NET Framework. The >>>> account is used to run ASP.NET pages locally on your computer. If >>>> you're not going to >>>> be doing any ASP.NET development, you can remove the account from >>>> your computer. You can delete it through Add and Remove Programs.
>>>> Look for ASP.NET Framework. Then delete the account in User >>>> Accounts --
>>>>
>>>> Harry Ohrn MS-MVP [Shell/User]
>>>> www.webtree.ca/windowsxp
>>>>
>>>>
>>>> "RJK" <notatospam@hotmail.com> wrote in message
>>>> news:%23DKTX3IseEHA.3876@TK2MSFTNGP15.phx.gbl...
```