Tried it, v3.8.1, and it fails in about 5 seconds normally, and about 7 seconds with a failsafe boot that turnoff almost all hardware detection. It is not a bad CD as it does work in another computer.

Now add that many average would have a hard time setting up and using Linux on all the varying hardware, and add to that that every major distro variation has different command line commands for things getting updates, and the average user doesn't even know how to use the command line in Windows, Linux is not ready for my mom, my personal measure of the average computer user.
