

Re: partitioned drive

Source:

<http://www.tech-archive.net/Archive/WinXP/microsoft.public.windowsxp.general/2005-07/msg05304.html>

- From: "Alan Smith" <alan@xxxxxxxxxxxxx>
 - Date: Mon, 11 Jul 2005 12:55:42 +0100
-

"_R" <_R@xxxxxxxxxx> wrote in message
news:qsf4d115v3qja13q7lb5s6oj8av37jcupt@xxxxxxxxxx

> On Sun, 10 Jul 2005 11:19:02 -0700, anneliese
> <anneliese@xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx> wrote:
>
>>I recently sent my computer for repair due to virus-related problems.
>>Anyway,
>>the repair person had to reinstall Win XP(Home) from scratch and told me >>that >>he had partitioned the drive (and without my permission!) in two:
>>D:/Backup
>>and C:/System (Backup consists of the files from the previous system).
>
> If your drive is large enough (say, 80GB or so) then there can be real > advantages in drive partitioning. It's preferable to keep programs > and data separate for various reasons.
>
> I usually use 20GB to 25GB for the system partition. I load > development tools so I generally have more programs loaded than most.
> You may be able to get by with less space.
>
> I also keep my temp internet files on another drive, as they tend to > clutter the program drive. If you forget to delete them, they'll also > get backed up along with your system drive. (Ask your tech about > imaging your C: drive).
>
> It sounds like your tech had something in mind. You may want to talk > to him before resetting your partitions. Maybe he can explain at > greater length.
>
>

I agree with the sentiment about temp files- unfortunately I forgot to do it when I reinstalled on this machine but it is on the list of things I must do.

- References:

- ◆ partitioned drive
 - ◇ From: anneliese
- ◆ Re: partitioned drive
 - ◇ From: _R

- Prev by Date: Re: Time to upgrade SP1 to SP2?
- Next by Date: Re: Time to upgrade SP1 to SP2?
- Previous by thread: Re: partitioned drive
- Next by thread: RE: partitioned drive
- Index(es):
 - ◆ Date
 - ◆ Thread