The above post was pulled from MS's Servers. MS has know since XP was in Beta that their too many installations PA message is confusing and misleading. That it is now 2006, and MS has yet to change that message, is a clear indication that this is purposeful, as changing the text of that message would be the easiest fix MS would ever have to make. But nearly 5 years later, still the same misleading message. If MS REALLY cared about its customers, that message would have been changed long ago, but that nearly 5 years has passed with MS doing absolutely NOTHING to change the message is pretty much proof that this misleading message is totally purposeful on Microsoft's part.

Instead of censoring me for pointing this out, if MS wants to demonstrate that what I'm saying isn't the whole story, then CHANGE THE EFFIN' MESSAGE! By censoring me, MS is showing that they'd rather hide from the truth, than do what is right for its customers!

Why can't you provide a clear explanation of your complaint without linking to a domain with a derogatory name?

Maybe the earlier messages were deleted because this site is operated by Microsoft to be allow people to assist each other instead of an oportunity merely complain. Some Usenet alt. or rec. group might be more accomidateing to articles that are merely rants. If your ISP doesn't offer a Usenet server, you can access them over the web through Google Groups.

Is this about a product refusing to activate over an internet connection? If so, have you tried activating using the toll free telephone number? If you used the toll free number were the representatives cooperative?

You are NOT enhancing your credabilty with the thinly disguised curseing in your message. We could have easily understood that portion of your displeasure with just "CHANGE THE MESSAGE!"
