RAM is seated properly. I ran the tests and no errors. I swapped it out for some other RAM and the problem is still there so I know now it's not the RAM.

I think it's definitely a software problem or perhaps the hard drives. But if it was the hard drives, I would gain no benefit from a fresh install of the OS would I? The strange thing is, the computer runs great for a while after a fresh install of the OS and then this problem appears randomly and inconsistently.

If it was the hard drives this problem would be constant wouldn't it?

I suspect software, too. However, it could be an intermittent hardware issue.

I ran Trend Micro online and found no viruses. That's two scanners showing no viruses.

Probably not a virus -- unless it's a virus interfering with your anti-virus efforts! That's why it's best to scan in safe mode with up-to-date definitions.

So it's not a virus, it's not RAM, not spyware, not corrupt registry (fresh OS install), no errors running chkdsk. I'm going to do a fresh install yet again and this time won't install the video card drivers or the chipset drivers and see what happens.

Good idea.
