He did go under user account but doesn't remember if he said yes or no. On the kodak software you can still see the pictures but they have a crack through them and they won't let you open them. Im just trying to figure out what to do before I call someone to try to fix it.

When you remove a user account from Control Panel > User Accounts, Windows asks whether you want to save the user's My Documents folder. If you answer 'yes' the My Documents folder is copied to the desktop. If you answer 'no' then the user's My Documents folder is permanently erased.

If your husband used a different method to remove your account, whether or not you can recover the My Documents folder depends on what he did.

All in all, another good reason to backup regularly.

Does anyone know how to restore a user account? My husband deleted mine because he thought it had a virus and now all the pictures I downloaded with kodak are gone. Is there anyway to get them back???
