On my old XP machine, in the Start/Programs list there was an item called "Terminal Services Client" and below that was "Client Connection Manager" which was basically a folder with a bunch of shortcuts for all of my terminal services connections. I loved that because it made all the connections easy to find and open, but with my new XP machine I don't see the "Terminal Services Client" anymore... I have to connect going directly to the "Remote Desktop Connection", which I don't think is as convenient to use. How can I get the Client Connection Manager on to my new machine? It's XP Professional, Version 2002 SP2.
Thanks!
John

That looks like a server side push to your XP box.
