I have NEVER had any mail from one hotmail account get into some other hotmail account when accessed via OE. In other words, hotmail account A and hotmail account B, when viewed in OE the mail appears in the correct A=A, B=B accounts.

I have never had the email actually get across the accounts. However, with Hotmail A and Hotmail B both in a single Identity, I have actually seen email from account A listed in the account B folder tree in MSOE. I could fix that by closing MSOE, then reopening it, when it happened, because it didn't happen 100% of the time. It was very annoying when it happened, though; and the only solution that ever worked for me was to simply create one Identity for each MSN Hotmail account, and just use Identity A for Hotmail account A, and Identity B for Hotmail account B, and so on.

Just a bit of flakiness in MSOE. At this time, I only have a single Hotmail account which I can access through MSOE. MSN was, originally, going to just turn it off for all free Hotmail accounts. They ultimately relented, and continue to allow access to free accounts which had access prior to their Sept. 26, 2004 cutoff date; but, by then, my other Hotmail accounts had expired.

And I only use MS Outlook Express for one single, extremely useful feature: I can actually move email between the desktop and the client. I can forward email as an attachment to accounts which I access with Pegasus Mail. PM allows me to save the attached email message as an .eml file. MSOE allows me to drag and drop the .eml file into an MSOE folder. Then I can use IMAP accounts to move that email around within the mail clients.
