Jay, do you know if installing Office 2007 disables the MSE in previous versions? I know I had it in Word 2003 on my old machine, can't swear that I installed it on the new one, but when I used Alt+Shift+F11 the other day, I got an error message, and when I tried to install, Word went off into Neverland.

"Microsoft Script Editor (MSE): The removal of this low-use feature increases security. Documents that contain scripts and that are upgraded to the new file formats will lose the scripts without warning."

For updating links, you can use a macro like the one in assuming this is something Microsoft no longer supports? Has anyone needed to do this? Since it had been assigned a shortcut keystroke, in earlier versions, you would think it was a pretty integral piece of the software.....

I have a document that has about 150 links to an excel worksheet. I need to update the link path. Previously I would use the Word script editor, to perform this function. This does not seem to be available in Word 2007, or I just can not find it. It appears the only way to change a link in 2007 is to edit each link from within the link editor, and is tedious at best. How can I get to the script editor for Word 2007, is the functionality still there?
